The effect of different vaccination regimens on the immune responses to live and inactivated H5N1 avian influenza vaccines in chickens. In this study, we compare the immune responses and protection in chickens immunized by intramuscular injection, live attenuated intranasal and live attenuated intramuscular (IM) vaccines against H5N1 avian influenza challenge. Our data show that both the IM injection with H5N1 HA (rHA) and live attenuated intranasal (IN) H5N1 vaccines are effective at protecting chickens from lethal challenge. Compared to the control, IM vaccines induced a higher titer of H5N1 specific antibodies. The neutralizing antibody titers in the IM and IN immunized groups were much higher than those in the negative control group. The serum antibody titers induced by IM vaccines were not different from those induced by IN vaccines in chickens. However, the sera from the IN vaccinated group had lower HI titer than those from the IM vaccinated group. Neither H5N1 HA DNA vaccine nor any other adjuvant demonstrated a synergistic effect with the H5N1 HA vaccine on the production of H5N1 HA-specific antibodies in chickens. The homologous or heterologous challenge with live attenuated H5N1 IN vaccine conferred significant protection, while challenge with wild type virus did not. Our results suggest that the effective protective immunization of H5N1 HPAI in chickens is induced by different vaccination regimens.
