Businesses and other organizations are more and more reliant on computers to store, manipulate, and provide access to information. As a result, there is a growing amount of information that may be desired to be exchanged between different parties. For example, the different parties may correspondingly desire to share information, read information, or modify information. For example, by way of another example, an individual may desire to exchange information with one or more other individuals, a business may exchange information with other businesses, a government agency may exchange information with other government agencies, and so on. Furthermore, increasingly, more and more businesses are relying on electronic mail to communicate to their customers or other businesses. A conventional electronic mail system, such as that provided by the Simple Mail Transfer Protocol (SMTP), may be deployed in a client/server environment. By way of background, SMTP is a protocol for exchanging messages between SMTP clients and servers. Further, SMTP was developed for use in transmitting electronic mail (i.e., e-mail). With SMTP, messages are typically transferred from an e-mail server to one or more mail servers, and to one or
