Efforts to identify Tay-Sachs disease (TSD) carriers among Ashkenazi Jews and individuals with certain genetic or metabolic disorders have historically relied on carrier testing for Tay-Sachs disease, a relatively complex genetic test which is rarely performed for routine clinical use. A retrospective cohort study of all 544,715 carrier tests in English hospitals over the past 10 years was performed to determine the nature of provider referral pattern, cost and clinical outcomes. We found a strong 'preference' for the more complex, more expensive, and/or more specific prenatal screening tests (e.g. chorionic villus sampling), which is contrary to previous studies of routine clinical practice. This finding is most likely caused by systematic bias to refer all carriers to large centers with the appropriate expertise and/or infrastructure to conduct more sophisticated genetic analysis.I will be honest: by the end of the day, I went through the archives and found no post that was a "best of" post. The difference between the best content and the best post was one of two things: 1) It's the last day of the contest. 2) I had some sort of hit on a post or tweet that I wanted to make a special mention of. If you were in that game, thank you. If you found your way to this site via a link, thank you. If you just read it, thank you. And if you were on the guest list that I promised to guest-post about, thank you, too. You're still in the running. P.S. You're right about the fact that nothing else would have been just as fun for me, but that's the point of a contest. And now I've forgotten what the "thug" post was about... P.P.S. Those of you who found me via a link or
