New diet and weight loss plans are being sold on a weekly basis, and they are all promising great results. Some of these diets even claim to eliminate the need to exercise. Unfortunately, many of these diets can actually cause you to get ill instead of thin. The first thing to remember when cutting back on calories is that your body needs calories in order to function properly. Calories are burned as a result of physical activity, and you also burn some during the process of digestion. When you eliminate your normal calorie intake, your body does not have a choice in the matter; it will begin using its fat reserves as quickly as possible. When it comes down to your body fighting against starvation, starvation usually wins out. Your body will begin to tap into your fat reserves instead of burning your muscles. This can cause you to look bigger and fatter. Not only will your body not burn much energy, it may actually feel like you have been starving all of your life. When your body sees that you have not been getting enough food, it will begin to store this additional energy as a fat reserve. This can lead to muscle twitching, muscle cramps, and even seizures. In severe cases, death can result. If your goal is to burn calories rather than store them, you must find a way to burn them for energy. The quickest way to burn calories is to exercise, and most of these diets allow you to exercise on a very restricted amount of calories. The only problem with this strategy is that you are really only able to burn your muscles and generate a very small amount of energy. What you are doing is forcing your muscles to work overtime, and if you are not careful, they will not be able to keep up. When attempting to exercise on a very low calorie diet, you need to find a way to stimulate your body to become more efficient at creating energy. Exercise will help you burn more calories for a longer period of time, but you must also give your muscles enough fuel to work properly. The most common thing that people do to stimulate their muscles is to eat a small amount of calories during the exercise. You do not need to do this though. You can find a formula that will stimulate your muscles to burn more calories for a longer period of 0cc13bf012
