Rodeo Knights, as a subgenre of dungeoneering, comes from the original Dungeons & Dragons, and focuses on characters who seek adventure in the wilderness rather than dungeons. Some people divide the group into two types, the "Rodeo" group, and the "Dungeoneering" group. Rodeos can feature team mates, other party members, and NPCs in various ways, such as in combat, to help the players. Rodeo play also usually features a good deal of character generation in the form of character classes, but often incorporates other elements of character generation as well. In general, the game is played on a flat, non-linear map, a bit like a sandbox. This is where the game leaves the dungeoneering aspect, and gives the players great freedom to do what they want. Usually, Rodeos take place in some relatively mundane setting (usually outdoors, sometimes in settlements, but there can be "travelling" Rodeos), and with no monsters to fight. The players play their characters as they go, and they usually have a lot of flexibility regarding their objectives, as well as their mechanics. Classes and equipment can generally be freely modified at any time, as can character motivations. A typical campaign for an experienced group of players might last from a few weeks to a few months. Ronin Commando. Rape Monitor - A program which listens for conversations on your network. Scala: Why does this instance check in the methods of a trait fails? I have the following Scala code: trait T { def check(f: =>Int, g: =>Int): Unit = if (f > 0) "foo" if (g > 0) "bar" if (f > g) "baz" } object T { def main(args: Array[String]): Unit = { println(new T.check(f => f * f, g => g * g)) } def f(x:Int):Int = x + 1 def g(x:Int):Int = x + 1 } Why does this fail: java.lang.AssertionError: assertion failed: f > 0 java.lang.StringBuilder.append (StringBuilder.java:228) T.this.check (T.scala:13) But this works: trait T { def check(f: =>Int, g: =>Int): Unit = if (f > 0) "foo" if (g > 0) "bar" if (f > g) "baz" } object T { def main(args: Array[String]): Unit = { println(new T.check(f => f * f, g => g * g)) } def f(x:Int):Int = x + 1 def g 6d1f23a050
